design resembling a sunflower. Below the waistband are set-in pockets, which are covered by flaps (cut one with the front leg panels) that button on the hips.

The fall is 8 1/2 inches wide and is created by slashing the top of the front leg panel and inserting a triangular-shaped piece of fabric behind. The fall buttons to the waistband above the lowest center front button. There is a watch pocket on the proper right side of the waistband. The breeches are cut smooth in front, but full in the seat. The back is gathered into the waistband. The waistband is split at the center back and has worked holes, indicating that a lacing would have controlled the fit. The legs are open for 8 1/2 inches up the side seam, and are closed with smaller "sunflower" buttons. The knee band would also have buttoned, but the button is missing from both legs. The waistband is lined with a plain-woven linen. The pockets are constructed of osnabrig. These breeches were originally owned by General Lemuel Grosvenor of Pomfret, Connecticut.

On November 7, 1789, General Washington visited Lemuel Grosvenor and appointed him the first Postmaster of Pomfret, with offices opening January 1, 1795. Lemuel Grosvenor served as Postmaster for nearly 40 years until his death in 1833.
