Pandemic. Jay Williams is the President and CEO of the Hartford Foundation for Public Giving. Jay Williams spoke about the suddenness of the onset of the pandemic - how quickly Covid went from something on the news to something they should plan for to everyone is staying home and not coming into the office and they will just have to figure out how things will work. He discusses the challenges of running an organization at a time when information was shifting, and no one was certain how long it would last. He discusses the importance of being transparent with staff, with donors, and with other organizations. He addresses how the organization changed and ultimately became stronger because they had to do so. As a Black man, he has thought part of the Hartford Foundation for Public Giving' s job is to address inequity and systemic racism.

Williams described Covid as one pandemic and systemic racism as another, and that the Black Lives Matter protests demonstrated how the two were intertwined. The election of 2020 and the U.S. Capitol Insurrection of January 6, 2021 led the Foundation to hold conversations, internally and externally, about democracy and civil society and the foundation' s place in a way that was not partisan but involved an awareness of how they connected to issues of inequity.

Williams ultimately took away from the pandemic an appreciation for his colleagues, and how important it has been to trust and rely on them and caused him to focus on improving his own mental and physical health. And that in the future, he may be forgotten, but the organization will have helped to play a role in building a more just and more equitable society.
