Strips of plain-woven linen are whip-stitched to each side of the silk ground.

These are nailed at regular intervals to the wooden stretcher that forms the support for the needlework. The stretcher is constructed with nailed lap joints at each of the four corners. The needlework and stretcher are separated from the glass, frame and backing (all original) that form the remainder of the needlework picture. The glass is painted in gold and black to form a border, title and signature for the needlework. The gilded wooden frame consists of deeply curved cove molding with a rope twist band applied inside. The backing (now encased in plastic) consists of a New York newspaper. Stitches: The primary stitch on the needlework picture is satin stitch; it also includes encroaching satin, long and short, and couching. Condition: The needlework and stretcher are separated from the frame; the glass and backing are removed from the frame. The silk ground has shattered in several places, most notably in the foreground and elsewhere where the painted and stitched areas of the picture meet. The thread and yarn is discolored. The newspaper is fragile and yellowed.
