Medium Architectural drawings, ink and watercolor on paper

Description Section drawings for a gothic revival building, probably a library, featuring a large central portion flanked by octagonal towers, with two smaller buttressed side portions. 1913.5.52 shows a large central nave with two smaller side aisles. The central nave features a large open gallery space with an ornamental fenced handrail and pendant drop oriel underlay which connects the third floor space between the two side portions, below which a pointed arch doorway features on the ground floor. The central nave also has a large diamond paned lancet arch window, with cusped arch tracery, and details suggesting stained glass. The two side aisles feature three floors in which bookcases are shown along the side and end walls. The third floor of each aisle features a pointed arch ceiling with implied stained glass skylights located on the roof. 1913.5.53 shows a large central portion, with two smaller side aisles, of which the central portion is divided into three bays. The middle bay of the central portion features a large lancet arch window with cusped arch tracery, below which a small open gallery with ornamental fenced handrail connects the two side bays. The side bays of the central section feature three floors of bookcases along the side and end walls, with wide open galleries, featuring similar ornamental handrails, placed between floors and faced towards the middle bay to let light in. The ground floor of the central section is over a space of two stories, featuring a pointed arch entry door in the middle bay with single mullion lancet windows above bookcases in the side bays. The two small side portions of the building feature single bays over two floor levels with the same open gallery and bookcase design as the central section, and end with skylights on the second floor level.
