Description (a) Interview with Shannon Carter. Interviewed by Peter Moran on July 21, 2022 at New Haven Free Public Library Ives Branch, 133 Elm Street, New Haven. (b) Photograph of Shannon Carter taken at her interview. She was interviewed as part of the Connecticut Historical Society's Community History Project discussing her experience during the COVID-19 Pandemic. Shannon Carter is a former library employee who has recently completed a master's degree in public health. She started this degree during the pandemic at Yale University, and it helped inform her knowledge of policy and public health. Shannon has worked various retail jobs, including working at Starbucks during the pandemic, and identifies with the disabled community due to an autoimmune disorder. She said both experiences often lead to dehumanization by others. The pandemic gave a brief glimpse of a society that was more accessible, more cautious, and briefly more accommodating. The pandemic was very political to Shannon, both in a sense of partisanship, but also in a sense of privilege and power for different people, bodies, and institutions. She took part in some Black Lives Matter protests. Shannon's mother caught COVID-19 and
